Passage summary:

A man approached a philosopher and said, "Someone in the market called you a [fool] ." The philosopher smiled and continued walking, entirely [unbothered] . The messenger, surprised, asked, "Does it not trouble you to be [insulted] ?" The philosopher replied, "If a stranger threw a stone that missed me entirely, would I feel [struck] ?" The messenger shook his head. "No, because it never actually [hit] you." The philosopher nodded. "A word only wounds me if I choose to let it [land] ." He explained that an insult is only an opinion offered by another, and opinions carry no weight unless we agree to [carry] them. The messenger asked, "So you feel nothing at all?" The philosopher said, "I notice it, but I do not have to [accept] it." What disturbs most people is not the insult itself, but their own judgment that it must be [true] . The philosopher added, "Ask instead: is there truth in what was said? If so, correct it. If not, why should I [keep] it?" The messenger began practising this himself, noticing how much lighter he felt when he stopped [catching] every remark aimed at him. He finally understood: we are rarely hurt by words alone. We are hurt by the meaning we choose to [place] upon them.
